

FOREIGN.

M. Jules Favre was presented to Napoleon on his election to the French Academy. He expressed the sorrow he felt at the death of M. Cousin, whose elevation of mind and patriotism he knew how to appreciate. A French Academician replied: "Sir, formerly men like M. Cousin do not altogether die; they survive in their works, and the philosophical tendency to which my predecessor deserved the Empire, will remain." And the instruction you speak of is one of the glories of France."

The death of M. Henry Didier, one of the Government Members of the French Legislative body, gives occasion for some curious anecdotes. M. Didier was possessed of a considerable fortune and a good education, and made some studies and the fine arts. Three or four years ago an incident occurred which brought him name before the public, and led to law proceedings. An article having appeared in the Figaro according to the report of the Journal des Chambres, M. Didier proceeded to the house of the editor of that paper, M. de Villeneuve, and committed a violent assault upon him. Some weeks back M. Didier presented himself in one of a grand Tark as an official of one of the departments, and inquired respecting to him a speech which he proposed to make the following day in the Chamber against the Opposition. The Minister once saw that he was insane, and he privately requested the Oppositor to give him notice of his departure. This was done, and M. Didier was as good as his word. He presented himself in the Tribune the next day, and pronounced a violent and impudent speech, accompanied by much gesticulation. The Minister, who had known nothing of the real state of the case, were surprised at reading the speech, softened as it was in some passages in the interest of the author with the period which he depicts, and the whole so well and skilfully woven together, that the interest of the reader is riveted from beginning to end.

One of the most eminent German critics says of this excellent work:

"Who would not like to read the history of the French Bourgeoisie, told by the German Bourgeoisie?"
